Activity

This activity will work best with grades K - 3. Do this activity with a small group of students who need help learning to get along better with others. Watch a video of the illustrated poem, The Crayon Box that Talked. There are many versions. <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sqiwQUUw0jE> is one. Watch this with the students, then talk about how the crayons went from not liking each other at first, to liking each other after they saw what the others could do, and what they each brought to the picture. Use this to set the stage for talking about how seeing what other people bring to a "picture" helps us appreciate them.

Procedure

Give the pre-survey before the lesson. It may need to be modified based on the age of the students.

Select a small group of students who have had some trouble being nice or getting along with classmates. Have them watch the video of the illustrated poem The Crayon Box That Talked. (There are many versions on the internet. Find one that you like best.)

Discuss: How did the crayons' feelings about other colors in the box change when they saw what they could bring to the picture? Ask why they think this may have happened.

Ask if anyone has experience not really liking someone at first then getting to know them better and realizing they did like them.

Have students each draw a picture that has a specific role for each color and tell why that color is important to their picture.
